

REAL WILD WEST TRIMMINGS TO SALOON HOLD-UP

Six Thugs Terrorize Place. Make Merry and Get Away With Cash and Whiskey.

UP ON NINTH AVENUE.

Bullets Whiz Around Bartender and a Customer Is Dropped with Blackjack.

This story should interest Commissioner Bingham.

James Kiernan, the bartender in Thomas Murray's saloon, at the north-west corner of Ninth avenue and Forty-fifth street, was serving a customer, James Cunningham, a street car conductor, with a drink two hours after daylight to-day, when the door at the rear of the saloon opened and a short, stout, swarthy man stepped in.

At the same moment the front doors swung open and three other men entered. The four bore down on the bartender. Suddenly the stocky man who had entered from the rear, snatched out a revolver from his coat pocket and, pointing it at Kiernan, snapped out:

"Put up your hands and be damn quick about it!" Cunningham, the conductor, had his drink half way to his lips. He set it down and stared the stocky man with the revolver.

Faced Trier Pistols. "Say, that's no joke!" he began protesting, when one of the other three men in front of the bar struck him on the back of the head with a blackjack. He fell sprawling and made no further protest. It all happened so quickly that Kiernan hadn't time to open the drawer where the saloon revolver was kept before he found four pistols pointed at his face.

"Come out from behind that bar!" ordered the stocky man, who seemed to be the leader of the pistol-wielders. Kiernan looked at the four shooting irons and obeyed.

"Now get up on that chair," was the next order. The bartender, his hands above his head, climbed up obediently. The four took turns in sampling the saloon stock, while those unengaged with the bottle kept Kiernan cowered.

Then the stocky man pocketed his gun and went through the cash register, taking $5, the night's receipts. With one of his companions to help, they then looted the place of about a dozen bottles of whiskey. Then the stocky man drew his gun again and sent a Labor as a Shareholder. There are other business establishments besides the United States Steel Corporation that are turning the men who work for them into the men who own them.

There are other business establishments besides the United States Steel Corporation that are turning the men who work for them into the men who own them. The National Biscuit Company, dated Jan. 31, 1908, this interesting paragraph:

"The total number of stockholders of the company immediately after its organization was about thirteen hundred. The total number now is about five hundred. Of this number twenty-three hundred and ninety-five are employees of the company. Under the plan enabling employees to purchase one preferred stock, paying for it in installments, the company has issued one hundred and thirty-three shares. This is exclusive of a very large amount of stock held by common and preferred shareholders. The company is held by our directors, officers and principal managers."

We do not know how large a pay roll the National Biscuit Company carries. Its sales during the ten years of its existence have increased from $4,500,000 in 1898 to $45,000,000 during the year 1907. Doubtless it maintains a large force, although not to be compared with the big industrial army of 200,000 men which the United States Steel Corporation makes work for in normal times. The number of the persons employed by the National Biscuit Company are also owners in the company. It is, however, upon any probable basis, not only a highly satisfactory showing from the point of view of the man who desires to see every wage-earner grow to be a property-owner, but it is also a strong element of stability in operation for the company itself.

"Another paragraph from this report is worth reproducing as follows: "Our increase in sales is not due to the fact that there is a less number of rival manufacturers, but rather than there was in the first year of the existence of this company. On the contrary, the number has increased. We have frequently stated that the policy of this company was not to buy out competitors, but to attempt by a rigorous war of prices, to crush the same, and to that policy we have steadfastly adhered. We offer our goods for sale at a fixed price and upon stated terms, available to all grocers."

Not to chase after the rainbow of doing all the business in their line, but to aim at the substance of doing that part of this business which they secure the best, especially the old American idea of live and let live, making pre-eminence and success depend upon merit, and not upon mechanical financial control. This old idea goes well with the new practice of changing as many as possible of the men who work for the company into shareholders in the company."

bullet so near Kiernan's head that it ruffled his hair and went smashing into a twelve-by-twelve mirror, deluging the bartender with glass. Another looter seemed to think this a good idea, for he started target practice by shooting at a statue of the saloon school of art that stood in the centre of the bar. The smoke of the last shot was still in the air when two men ran in from outside.

"Here comes a car-beat it!" they yelled, and ran out again, followed by the four, distributing the bottles as they ran. A south-bound Ninth avenue car came along as they emerged, and by running they managed to make it.

Laughed at Victim.

"Had a good St. Patrick's day?" inquired the conductor as the six swung the track shouting, "Stop thief!" for all he was worth.

"Fine," panted the stocky man. Behind the car Kiernan, who had recovered his wits, stood in the centre of the track shouting: "Stop thief!" for all he was worth. The six men on the rear platform laughed as the car sped along. There were few passengers to pick up on Ninth avenue in the early morning, and the car did not stop as long as Kiernan kept it in sight. From the way the conductor joined in his passengers' laughter Kiernan figured out they must be telling him they had been on a spree and been too boisterous in the saloon. Cunningham, the conductor, was on his feet and joined Kiernan as the car disappeared. He had thought it more prudent to lie still after he had been struck, and returning to consciousness saw what was going on.

The whole affair occupied about twenty-five minutes and took place within two blocks of the West Forty-seventh street police station. Policemen Love and Goss of that precinct were assigned to investigate Kiernan told them that he thought from the appearance of the six bandits they were Italians.
